1. Read the following passage and answer the questions that follow: [5×3=15]

Although there have been many studies in food production technologies and education campaigns, the International Food Policy Research Institute (IFPRI) indicates that it is quite likely that food security and child malnutrition will remain serious threats to much of the world's population for the next two decades. Almost 60 percent of the agricultural communities in the tropics and subtropics have suffered a troublesome decline in per capita food distribution rates. Technological improvements such as new irrigation methods and disease-resistant genetic clones have created new opportunities in select communities; however, agricultural concerns are often in competition with industrial household and environmental uses of local resources.

A specific example can be found in the scarcity of water supplies. Water use is projected to increase by 50 percent over the next 20 years, while the increase in irrigation will only reach four percent. That trend will ultimately have a negative impact on food production. Global warming represents another documented threat to food production and the health of the global environment. The 1990s were the hottest decade of the previous century and 1998, 2001 and 2002 were three of the hottest years in the recorded history.
